

THE TWELVE

Stuart Neville's first novel, The Twelve, is one of the most critically acclaimed crime debuts of recent years with rave reviews in the Observer and Daily Mail, as well as garnering praise from such authors as James Ellroy, John Connolly, Jeff Abbott and Ken Bruen. In America it was selected as one of the top crime novels of the year by both the New York Times and the LA Times. Stuart is a partner in a multimedia business in the wilds of Northern Ireland.

STUART NEVILLE

The Twelve

VINTAGE BOOKS

London

Published by Vintage 2010

2 4 6 8 10 9 7 5 3 1

Copyright © Stuart Neville 2009

Stuart Neville has asserted his right under the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988 to be identified as the author of this work

This novel is a work of fiction. Names and characters are the product of the author's imagination and any resemblance to actual persons, living or dead, is entirely coincidental.

The quotation on p. vii is from 'The Bloody Brae: A Dramatic Poem' by John Hewitt, The Collected Poems of John Hewitt, ed. Frank Ormsby (Blackstaff Press, 1991), reproduced by permission of Blackstaff Press on behalf of the Estate of John Hewitt.

This book is sold subject to the condition that it shall not, by way of trade or otherwise, be lent, resold, hired out, or otherwise circulated without the publisher's prior consent in any form of binding or cover other than that in which it is published and without a similar condition, including this condition, being imposed on the subsequent purchaser

First published in Great Britain in 2009 by Harvill Secker

Vintage
Random House, 20 Vauxhall Bridge Road,
London SW1V 2SA

www.vintage-books.co.uk

Addresses for companies within The Random House Group Limited can be found at: www.randomhouse.co.uk/offices.htm

The Random House Group Limited Reg. No. 954009

A CIP catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library

ISBN 9780099535348

The Random House Group Limited supports The Forest Stewardship Council (FSC), the leading international forest certification organisation. All our titles that are printed on Greenpeace approved FSC certified paper carry the FSC logo.

Our paper procurement policy can be found at:
www.rbooks.co.uk/environment

Printed and bound in Great Britain by CPI Bookmarque, Croydon CR0 4TD

For Ellen Emerald Neville

‘The place that lacks its ghosts is a barren place.’

John Hewitt

TWELVE

I

Maybe if he had one more drink they'd leave him alone. Gerry Fegan told himself that lie before every swallow. He chased the whiskey's burn with a cool black mouthful of Guinness and placed the glass back on the table. Look up and they'll be gone, he thought.

No. They were still there, still staring. Twelve of them if he counted the baby in its mother's arms.

He was good and drunk now. When his stomach couldn't hold any more he would let Tom the barman show him to the door, and the twelve would follow Fegan through the streets of Belfast, into his house, up his stairs, and into his bedroom. If he was lucky, and drunk enough, he might pass out before their screaming got too loud to bear. That was the only time they made a sound, when he was alone and on the edge of sleep. When the baby started crying, that was the worst of it.

Fegan raised the empty glass to get Tom's attention.

'Haven't you had enough, Gerry?' Tom asked. 'Is it not home time yet? Everyone's gone.'

'One more,' Fegan said, trying not to slur. He knew

Tom would not refuse. Fegan was still a respected man in West Belfast, despite the drink.

Sure enough, Tom sighed and raised a glass to the optic. He brought the whiskey over and counted change from the stained tabletop. The gummy film of old beer and grime sucked at his shoes as he walked away.

Fegan held the glass up and made a toast to his twelve companions. One of the five soldiers among them smiled and nodded in return. The rest just stared.

‘Fuck you,’ Fegan said. ‘Fuck the lot of you.’

None of the twelve reacted, but Tom looked back over his shoulder. He shook his head and continued walking to the bar.

Fegan looked at each of his companions in turn. Of the five soldiers three were Brits and two were Ulster Defence Regiment. Another of the followers was a cop, his Royal Ulster Constabulary uniform neat and stiff, and two more were Loyalists, both Ulster Freedom Fighters. The remaining four were civilians who had been in the wrong place at the wrong time. He remembered doing all of them, but it was the civilians whose memories screamed the loudest.

There was the butcher with his round face and bloody apron. Fegan had dropped the package in his shop and held the door for the woman and her baby as she wheeled the pram in. They’d smiled at each other. He’d felt the heat of the blast as he jumped into the already moving car, the blast that should have come five minutes after they'd cleared the place.

The other was the boy. Fegan still remembered the look in his eyes when he saw the pistol. Now the boy sat across the table, those same eyes boring into him.

Fegan couldn't hold his gaze, so he turned his eyes downward. Tears pooled on the tabletop. He brought his fingers to the hollows of his face and realised he'd been weeping.

'Jesus,' he said.

He wiped the table with his sleeve and sniffed back the tears. The pub's stale air clung to the back of his throat, as thick as the dun-coloured paint on the walls. He scolded himself. He neither needed nor deserved pity, least of all his own. Weaker men than him could live with what they'd done. He could do the same.

A hand on his shoulder startled him.

'Time you were going, Gerry,' Michael McKenna said.

Tom slipped into the storeroom behind the bar. McKenna paid him to be discreet, to see and hear nothing.

Fegan knew the politician would come looking for him. He was smartly dressed in a jacket and trousers, and his fine-framed designer glasses gave him the appearance of an educated man. A far cry from the teenager Fegan had run the streets with thirty years ago. Wealth looked good on him.

'I'm just finishing,' Fegan said.

‘Well, drink up and I’ll run you home.’ McKenna smiled down at him, his teeth white and even. He’d had them fixed so he could look presentable for the cameras. The party leadership had insisted on it before they gave him the nomination for his seat in the Assembly. At one time, not so long past, it had been against party policy to take a seat at Stormont. But times change, even if people don’t.

‘I’ll walk,’ Fegan said. ‘It’s only a couple of minutes.’

‘It’s no trouble,’ McKenna said. ‘Besides, I wanted a word.’

Fegan nodded and took another mouthful of stout. He held it on his tongue when he noticed the boy had risen from his place on the other side of the table. It took a moment to find him, shirtless and skinny as the day he died, creeping up behind McKenna.

The boy pointed at the politician’s head. He mimed firing, his hand thrown upwards by the recoil. His mouth made a plosive movement, but no sound came.

Fegan swallowed the Guinness and stared at the boy. Something stirred in his mind, one memory trying to find another. The chill at his centre pulsed with his heartbeat.

‘Do you remember that kid?’ he asked.

‘Don’t, Gerry.’ McKenna’s voice carried a warning.

‘I met his mother today. I was in the graveyard and she came up to me.’

‘I know you did,’ McKenna said, taking the glass from Fegan’s fingers.

‘She said she knew who I was. What I’d done. She said—’

‘Gerry, I don’t want to know what she said. I’m more curious about what you said to her. That’s what we need to talk about. But not here.’ McKenna squeezed Fegan’s shoulder. ‘Come on, now.’

‘He hadn’t done anything. Not really. He didn’t tell the cops anything they didn’t know already. He didn’t deserve that. Jesus, he was seventeen. We didn’t have to—’

One hard hand gripped Fegan’s face, the other his thinning hair, and the animal inside McKenna showed itself. ‘Shut your fucking mouth,’ he hissed. ‘Remember who you’re talking to.’

Fegan remembered only too well. As he looked into those fierce blue eyes he remembered every detail. This was the face he knew, not the one on television, but the face that burned with white-hot pleasure as McKenna set about the boy with a claw hammer, the face that was dotted with red when he handed Fegan the .22 pistol to finish it.

Fegan gripped McKenna’s wrists and prised his hands away. He stamped on his own anger, quashed it.

The smile returned to McKenna’s lips as he pulled his hands away from Fegan’s, but went no further. ‘Come on,’ he said. ‘My car’s outside. I’ll run you home.’

The twelve followed them out to the street, the boy sticking close to McKenna. McKenna had climbed high in the party hierarchy, but not so high he needed an escort to guard him. Even so, Fegan knew the Mercedes gleaming in the orange street lights was armoured, both bullet- and bomb-proof. McKenna probably felt safe as he lowered himself into the driver's seat.

'Big day today,' McKenna said as he pulled the car away from the kerb, leaving the followers staring after them. 'Sorting the offices up at Stormont, my own desk and everything. Who'd have thought it, eh? The likes of us up on the hill. I wangled a secretary's job for the wife. The Brits are throwing so much money at this I almost feel bad taking it off them. Almost.'

McKenna flashed Fegan a smile. He didn't return it.

Fegan tried to avoid seeing or reading the news as much as he could, but the last two months had been a hurricane of change. Just five months ago, as one year turned to the next, they'd said it was hopeless; the political process was beyond repair. Then mountains moved, deals were struck, another election came and went, while the shadows gathered closer to Fegan. And more often than before, those shadows turned to faces and bodies and arms and legs. Now they were a constant, and he couldn't remember when he last slept without first drowning them in whiskey.

They'd been with him since his last weeks in the Maze prison, a little over seven years ago. He'd just been given his release date, printed on a sheet of paper in a sealed envelope, and his mouth was dry when he opened it. The politicians on the outside had bartered for his freedom, along with hundreds more men and women. They called people like him political prisoners. Not murderers or thieves, not extortionists or blackmailers. Not criminals of any kind, just victims of circumstance. The followers were there when Fegan looked up from the letter, watching.

He told one of the prison psychologists about it. Dr Brady said it was guilt. A manifestation, he called it. Fegan wondered why people seldom called things by their real names.

McKenna pulled the Mercedes into the kerb outside Fegan's small terraced house on Calcutta Street. It stood shoulder to shoulder with two dozen identical red-brick boxes, drab and neat. The followers waited on the pavement.

'Can I come in for a second?' McKenna's smile sparkled in the car's interior lighting, and kind lines arced out from around his eyes. 'Better to talk inside, eh?'

Fegan shrugged and climbed out.

The twelve parted to let him approach his door. He unlocked it and went inside, McKenna following, the twelve slipping in between. Fegan headed straight for the sideboard where a bottle of Jameson's and a jug of water awaited him. He showed McKenna the bottle.

'No, thanks,' McKenna said. 'Maybe you shouldn't, either.'

Fegan ignored him, pouring two fingers of whiskey into a glass and the same of water. He took a deep swallow and extended his hand towards a chair.

‘No, I’m all right,’ McKenna said. His hair was well barbered, his skin tanned and smooth, a scar beneath his left eye the only remainder of his old self.

The twelve milled around the sparsely furnished room, merging with and diverging from the shadows, studying each man intently. The boy lingered by McKenna’s side as the politician went to the unstrung guitar propped in the corner. He picked it up and turned it in the light.

‘Since when did you play guitar?’ McKenna asked.

‘I don’t,’ Fegan said. ‘Put it down.’

McKenna read the label inside the sound hole. ‘Martin. Looks old. What’s it doing here?’

‘It belonged to a friend of mine. I’m restoring it,’ Fegan said. ‘Put it down.’

‘What friend?’

‘Just someone I knew inside. Please. Put it down.’

McKenna set it back in the corner. ‘It’s good to have friends, Gerry. You should value them. Listen to them.’

‘What’d you want to talk about?’ Fegan lowered himself into a chair.

McKenna nodded at the drink in Fegan’s hand. ‘About that, for one thing. It’s got to stop, Gerry.’

Fegan held the politician’s eyes as he drained the glass.

‘People round here look up to you. You’re a Republican hero. The young fellas need a role model, someone they can respect.’

‘Respect? What are you talking about?’ Fegan put the glass on the coffee table. The chill of condensation clung to his palm and he let his hands slide together, working the moisture over his knuckles and between his fingers. 'There's no respecting what I've done.'

McKenna's face flushed with anger. 'You did your time. You were a political prisoner for twelve years. A dozen years of your life given up for the cause. Any Republican should respect that.' His expression softened. 'But you're pissing it away, Gerry. People are starting to notice. Every night you're at the bar, drunk off your face, talking to yourself.'

'I'm not talking to myself.' Fegan went to point at the followers, but thought better of it.

'Then who are you talking to?' McKenna's voice wavered with an exasperated laugh.

'The people I killed. The people we killed.'

'Watch your mouth, Gerry. I never killed anybody.'

Fegan met McKenna's blue eyes. 'No, the likes of you and McGinty were always too smart to do it yourselves. You used mugs like me instead.'

McKenna folded his arms across his barrel chest. 'Nobody's hands are clean.'

'What else?' Fegan asked. 'You said "for one thing". What else do you want?'

McKenna circled the room, the boy following, and Fegan had to twist in his chair to keep him in sight. 'I need to know what you told that woman,' McKenna said.

‘Nothing,’ Fegan said. ‘I’m not much of a talker. You know that.’

‘No, you’re not. But a reliable source tells me the cops are going to start digging up the bogs near Dungannon in the next few days. Round about where we buried that boy. His mother told them where to look.’ McKenna moved to the centre of the room and loomed over Fegan. ‘Now, how did she know that, Gerry?’

‘Does it matter?’ Fegan asked. ‘Jesus, there’ll be nothing left of him. It’s been more than twenty years.’

‘It matters,’ McKenna said. ‘If you open your mouth, you’re a tout. And you know what happens to touts.’

Fegan tightened his fingers on the chair’s armrests.

McKenna leaned down, his hands on his thighs. ‘Why, Gerry? Why’d you tell her? What good did you think it’d do?’

Fegan searched for a lie, anything, but found nothing. ‘I thought maybe he’d leave me alone,’ he said.

‘What?’ McKenna straightened.

‘I thought he’d go,’ Fegan said. He looked at the boy aiming his fingers at McKenna’s head. ‘I thought he’d leave me alone. Give me some peace.’

McKenna took a step back. ‘Who? The boy?’

‘But that wasn’t what he wanted.’

‘Christ, Gerry.’ McKenna shook his head. ‘What’s happened to you? Maybe you should see a doctor, you know, get straight. Go away for a while.’

Fegan looked down at his hands. 'Maybe.'

'Listen.' McKenna put a hand on Fegan's shoulder. 'My source talks only to me, nobody else. You've been a good friend to me over the years, and that's the only reason I haven't gone to McGinty with this. If he knew you opened your mouth to that auld doll, it's your body the cops would be looking for.'

Fegan wanted to jerk his shoulder away from McKenna's hand. He sat still.

'Of course, I might need you to return the favour. There's work I could put your way. I've a few deals going on, stuff McGinty isn't in on. If you can stay off the drink, get yourself right, you could be a big help to me. And McGinty doesn't need to know what you said to that boy's mother.'

Fegan watched the boy's face contort as the other shadows gathered around him.

'Do you understand what I'm saying to you, Gerry?'

'Yes,' Fegan said.

'Good man.' McKenna smiled.

Fegan stood. 'I need a piss.'

McKenna stepped back and said, 'Don't be long.'

Fegan made his way up the stairs and into the bathroom. He closed and bolted the door but, as always, the followers found their way in. Except the boy. Fegan paid it little mind, instead concentrating on keeping upright while he emptied his bladder. He had long since gotten used to the twelve witnessing his most undignified moments.

He flushed, rinsed his hands under the tap, and opened the door. The boy was there, on the landing, waiting for him. He stared into the darkness of Fegan's bedroom.

Fegan stood for a moment, confused, as his temples buzzed and the chill pulsed at his centre.

The boy pointed into the room.

'What?' Fegan asked.

The boy bared his teeth, and his skinny arm jerked towards the door.

'All right,' Fegan said. He walked to his bedroom, glancing back over his shoulder.

The boy followed him into the darkness and knelt at the foot of the bed. He pointed underneath.

Fegan got to his hands and knees and peered under the bedstead. Thin light leaking in from the landing showed the old shoebox hidden there.

He raised his head, questioning. The boy nodded.

Fegan could just reach it if he stretched. He pulled it towards himself. Something heavy shifted inside as it moved, and Fegan's heart quickened. He removed the lid and was met by the greasy smell of money. Rolls of banknotes were bundled in here, twenties, fifties, hundreds. Fegan didn't know how much. He'd never counted it.

But there was something else, something cold and black lying half-concealed in the paper. Something Fegan didn't want in his hand. In the semi-darkness his eyes found the boy's.

‘No,’ Fegan said.

The boy stabbed at the object with his finger.

‘No.’ The word felt watery on Fegan’s tongue.

The boy’s mouth gaped, his hands grabbing clumps of hair. Before the scream could come, Fegan reached in and lifted the Walther P99 from its nest.

A grin blossomed on the boy’s face, his teeth glinting. He mimed the act of pulling back the slide assembly to chamber the first round.

Fegan looked from the boy to the pistol and back again. The boy nodded. Fegan drew back the slide, released it, hearing the snick-snick of oiled parts moving together. The gun was solid in his grasp, like the shake of an old friend’s hand.

The boy smiled, stood, and walked towards the landing.

Fegan stared down at the Walther. He had bought it a few weeks after leaving the Maze, just for protection, and it only came out of the box for cleaning. His fingertip found the trigger curled inside the guard.

The boy waited in the doorway.

Fegan got to his feet and followed him to the stairs. The boy descended, the lean grace of his body seemingly untouched by the light below.

Fegan began the slow climb downward. An adrenal surge stirred dark memories, voices long silenced, faces like bloodstains. The others came behind, sharing glances with one another. As he reached the bottom, he saw McKenna’s back. The politician studied the old photograph of Fegan's mother, the one that showed her young and pretty in a doorway.

The boy crossed the room and again played out the execution of the man who had taken him apart with a claw hammer more than twenty years ago.

Fegan's heart thundered, his lungs heaved. Surely McKenna would hear.

The boy looked to Fegan and smiled.

Fegan asked, 'If I do it, will you leave me alone?'

The boy nodded.

'What?' McKenna put the framed picture down. He turned to the voice and froze when he saw the gun aimed at his forehead.

'I can't do it here.'

The boy's smile faltered.

'Not in my house. Somewhere else.'

The smile returned.

'Jesus, Gerry.' McKenna gave a short, nervous laugh as he held his hands up. 'What're you at?'

'I'm sorry, Michael. I have to.'

McKenna's smile fell away. 'I don't get it, Gerry. We're friends.'

'We're going to get into your car.' The clarity crackled in Fegan's head. For the first time in months his hand did not shake.

McKenna's mouth twisted. 'Like fuck we are.'

‘We’re going to get into your car,’ Fegan repeated. ‘You in the front, me in the back.’

‘Gerry, your head’s away. Put the gun down before you do something you’ll regret.’

Fegan stepped closer. ‘The car.’

McKenna reached out. ‘Now, come on, Gerry. Let’s just calm down a second, here, all right? Why don’t you give that to me, and I’ll put it away. Then we’ll have a drink.’

‘I won’t say it again.’

‘No messing, Gerry, let me have it.’

McKenna went to grab the gun, but Fegan pulled his hand away. He brought it back to aim at the centre of McKenna’s forehead.

‘You always were a mad cunt.’ McKenna kept his eyes on him as he went to the door. He opened it and stepped out onto the street. He looked left and right, right and left, searching for a witness. When his shoulders slumped, Fegan knew there was no one. This was not the kind of street where curtains twitched.

The Merc’s locking system sensed the key was in range, whirring and clunking as McKenna approached.

‘Open the back door,’ Fegan said.

McKenna did as he was told.

‘Now get in the front and leave the door open till I’m inside.’ Fegan kept the Walther trained on McKenna’s head until he was seated at the steering wheel.

Fegan slid into the back, careful not to touch the leather upholstery with his bare hands. He used a handkerchief to pull the door closed. Tom had seen him leave with the politician, so his prints around the front passenger seat didn't matter. McKenna sat quite still with his hands on the wheel.

'Now close the door and go.'

The Merc's big engine rumbled into life, and McKenna pulled away. Fegan took one glance from the back window and saw the twelve watching from the pavement. The boy stepped out onto the road and waved.

Fegan lay down flat in the cloaking shadows. He pressed the gun's muzzle against the back of the driver's seat, exactly where McKenna's heart would be, if he'd ever had one.